Sasha knows that the way things are with Jesse are more than half her fault. Everything had been going so perfectly and she'd managed to throw it out the window. Now she has to decide if he's worth the fight or if it's time to move on. Is dating a rock star—something she's sworn she'll never do—really worth the constant struggle? She is pretty sure that walking away would be easier.

But Jesse isn't completely blameless either. So when he starts to forgive her and he goes to her house to try to make amends, they're both blindsided by how they feel for each other. But picking up where they left off isn't an option. They have to start over. At the very beginning.

And now Jesse is going on tour—something he's been working so hard for, and something Sasha helped him reach. She knows it's going to be hard, but she'll be there supporting him every step of the way, and he'll be doing the same for her. They know that heartbreak isn't sustainable, but love is, so this should work.

Finally, Sasha is able to meet up with Jesse and see him perform. But what she sees makes her question every decision they've made together. He's a rock star, living a rock star life. That means drugs, alcohol, and groupies' relentless pursuits of the man she loves.

Will she be able to find the balance she needs to stay with Jesse? Will their love endure? Or will what she finds him doing on tour be the deal breaker of all deal breakers?
