An excerpt from preface:

The author of the following sheets makes no apology for writing on a subject of the last importance; and which, as far as I can find, has no where been so fully treated. He builds nothing on a thing so uncertain as Tradition, which differs in most countries; and of which, in all countries, the bulk of mankind are incapable of judging. But he thinks he has laid down such plain and evident rules, as may enable men of the meanest capacity to distinguish between Religion and Superstition; and has represented the former in every part so beautiful, so amiable, and so strongly affecting, that they, who in the least reflect, must be highly in love with it; and easily perceive that their duty and happiness are inseparable. Whether he has succeeded in this noble and generous attempt, the reader will be better able to judge, if he reads with the same freedom and impartiality as the author wrote.

The manner of debating a subject dialogue-wise, (as this between A and B) was esteemed by the ancients the most proper, as well as most prudent, way of exposing prevailing absurdities; and Tully's two discourses, de Natura Deorum, and de Divinatione, (both levelled against the superstition of his country-men) are living monuments of the expediency and usefulness of this way of writing. And certainly, the reader may be better entertained thus, than by that dry way of Objection and Answer, with which controversies are usually managed.
